

“This is Danielle Gardener, reporting live from downtown Hartford. Only hours after a horrible plane accident ripped through this once-quiet town, another incredible feat has just befallen. We’re getting confirmation now that... yes, Hell has officially frozen over.

The jet stream of the northeast fluctuated a lot lately, with high-pressure systems merging with the low-pressure systems of the eastern seaboard. This has directly affected the atmospheric conditions of Hell, our meteorological experts have said. A precipitation front combining with an extreme cold front has created adverse driving conditions, especially for anyone in Hell driving a Kia, and we know there are many of you there. Barometric readings are off the charts.

So, if you had any intentions of driving in Hell, I would not advice it as the National Weather Bureau has officially declared this a State of Emergency. More details as they occur.”
